A New and Improved AHEC Digital Library (ADL): More Than Just a Fresh Look

The NC AHEC recently launched a new and improved ADL (library.ncahec.net), which now features a simplified and more efficient search function similar in nature and functionality to the Google search interface. Now, with a single query, you can search across thousands of resources, including databases, journals, and books, all at once. Searching is now easier, faster, and more efficient, saving you valuable time.

In addition, the new ADL features a Publication Finder to browse journals and databases individually. Users can also create a personal profile to save their searches and bookmarks in one central place, which adds to efficiency and ease of use. The new ADL also features an entirely new interface, with an attractive, contemporary design and intuitive user experience. In addition to all the visual and experiential upgrades, the new ADL features new back-end architecture for improved speed, security, and reliability.

"The newly relaunched NC AHEC Digital Library represents a major improvement in the way our users interact with the thousands of resources we have in our collection," said Sarah Kimmel, MLIS, Director of Library Services for NC AHEC. "The new ADL makes it easier to search everything in our universe, and to keep all their searches together in the user's profile, making the ADL an entirely new experience and learning tool."

One important thing to note is that signing into the ADL has changed as well. While some North Carolina institutions will allow for single-sign-on (SSO) access, Cone Health affiliates can use the Cone Health Medical Library's portal along with their Cone Health login to access all of the resources in the ADL. Non-affiliated preceptors will access the ADL through the MyAHEC portal. Apply for access to the ADL here, and contact medical.library@conehealth.com with any questions.

Piedmont AHEC's Student Services Provides Reliable Housing for Health Profession Students

Piedmont AHEC provides reliable housing for health profession students during their clinical community experiences. Clinical rotations are a critical phase in medical education where students transition from classroom learning to real-world clinical practice. During these rotations, students work under the supervision of experienced clinical staff, gaining hands-on experience in treating patients across various specialties. They expose students to the unique challenges of providing care in underserved areas.

For many students, the cost and logistics of temporary housing can be a barrier preventing students from focusing, learning, and serving. The investment of providing housing not only benefits the students but also the communities they serve.

As North Carolina continues to face growing healthcare needs, especially in rural areas, Piedmont AHEC remains committed to supporting the next generation of health providers.

For additional information about student housing please contact tonya.baldwin@conehealth.com.

"Of all the stressful aspects of being a medical learner, I was incredibly grateful that finding safe and affordable housing wasn't one of them. The location was convenient and made it easy to juggle the various clinics I was assigned to. The entire process—from move-in to move-out—was smooth and hassle-free."
